How not to get burned at the steak (or burger in this case)

Rare...
A classification for gem stones and burgers. We just knock the horns off. Seared and heated, the center is still bright red but no, it ain't raw.

Medium rare...
(ah, these shades of distinction) Rather reddish.

Medium...
A popular size in t-shirts and a burger that takes a moderate line. Burger and grill get more acquainted, still juicy and pink in the middle.

Medium well...
(more of those distinct shades) Almost surrendering the pink.

Well done...
Any performance deserving of an encore and, of course, a burger. No newcomer to the grill, the burger is more worldly, the pink of naiveté is gone. Still juicy, but we're talking cooked.

Very well done...
Moderation is thrown to the wind. This is one cooked burger.

The Cherry Cricket

Denver • Colorado

A Brief Cricket History

Back when Cherry Creek North was a twinkle in some developer's eye (circa 1945) the restaurant that would become The Cherry Cricket was flipping burgers for locals. Starting in 1990, Eli McGuire watched over this oasis known as the Cricket, like a mother hen with an edge. All were welcome — every shape, size, color, age, and economic class was treated to incredible bar food, dedicated and thorough service, a mind-boggling selection of beverages to wet your whistle and an all around good time. On any given visit you might be accompanied by blue-haired country club bridge players, mail carriers, construction workers, families, buy-sell guys, swinging singles on the prowl, and even a fly fishing guide or two. All felt at home at The Cricket, because of Eli.

After Eli's passing in 2000, Wynkoop Holdings, Inc. purchased the long-lived landmark. Today, the Holdings team and Cricket staff are honoring Eli's dream of making The Cherry Cricket "the best neighborhood bar around."
